Learning in Latin America
Growing interest in Latin America’s human rights systems is evident in the work of the Baker Center’s Latin America team. Their research, which is focused on the Inter-American Human Rights System, looks at the evolution of the regional human rights system over time, identifying trends in the development of national human rights institutions, and profiling the work of human rights organizations in the region. The team’s work underscores the importance of human rights in shaping policies and practices, and the significant role that human rights advocacy can play in promoting change.

Economic Development
The team’s research on economic development in Latin America examines the impact of economic policies on human rights, particularly in the areas of labor rights and environmental justice. They explore the role of transnational corporations in shaping local economies and the challenges faced by communities in authoritarian regimes. Their work highlights the importance of human rights in promoting sustainable development and the need for stronger international cooperation in addressing global challenges.

Media Competencies
The team’s research on media competencies in Latin America examines the role of media in shaping public opinion and promoting transparency and accountability. They explore the challenges faced by journalists in authoritarian regimes, and the strategies used by governments to control and manipulate media. Their work highlights the importance of media in promoting democratic governance and the need for stronger international cooperation in supporting media freedom.

Global Security
The team’s research on global security examines the impact of global security policies on human rights, particularly in the areas of national security and counterterrorism. They explore the role of international organizations in shaping global security policies and the challenges faced by countries in balancing national security and human rights.

Global Education
The team’s research on global education examines the impact of global education policies on human rights, particularly in the areas of access to education and education outcomes. They explore the role of international organizations in shaping global education policies and the challenges faced by countries in promoting education for all.
